1 Most recently, Swain & Lapkin (2011) have proposed an important function for a neighboring concept, "Languaging", to restore higher-order cognitive processes with implications for adults with Mild Cognitive Impairment (MCI). 2 Kasper (2011) argues that interaction from a cognitive perspective is limited to a set of "interactional arrangements" to acquire "grammar". On the other hand, we see "interactional arrangements" not only help L2 learners develop their accuracy but they stimulate their fluency as well. What happens in Computer-Mediated Communications (CMC) can provide an obvious example. By overcoming the barriers to in-class interaction, CMC promotes a less stressful environment for learners to interact and improves their "overall" language proficiency (see Payne & Whitney, 2002; Abrams, 2003; Bax, 2003). 3 Psychologist "Jerome Bruner" developed the term "scaffolding".

Abstract:
Research on L2 pragmatic development forms the mainstay of many interlanguage pragmatic (ILP) inquiries. Yet promoting L2 pragmatic competence becomes an exceedingly demanding task when different constraints are brought to bear. This dilemma is due in large part to contrasting theories on interlanguage pragmatics development. From exposure to instruction, ILP research
